

PARCHMENT SLIP — I

A small square of aged parchment, folded tight. The creases are deep and worn smooth — this has been folded and unfolded many times over many years.

The Dawnmark rises when the anchor holds. The vessel must be willing. The energy of the third circuit does not disperse; it dwells.

PARCHMENT SLIP — II

A second small square of parchment, near-identical in size to the first. The ink is slightly lighter — written on a different day.

Ask the archivist what lives within the amber light. The answer is not in the records. Within them is the truth of the ritual's end.

PARCHMENT SLIP — III

A third slip, matching the others in size. The parchment feels different — lighter, slightly stiffer. This copy was made more recently.

Every third scholar agreed: the Dawnborn are the mechanism. The energy lives in willing vessels. The ritual waits still.

COLOPHON — OUTER COVER OF ARCHIVE BUNDLE

The outer cover page of a recovered bundle of documents. Heavy paper stamped with an Archive filing mark. Three signatures appear at the bottom, in different hands.

RITUAL OF ETERNAL DAWN
FINAL NOTATION

Archmagister Corven
Year o P.R. — the night of the ritual

[Document content — restricted]

Witnessed and attested:

CORVEN · SALI · WREN

In the order of our signatures.
In the order we understood.

[The first signature is bold. The second is precise.
The third is rushed, as if written while something else was already happening.]